QUESTION PRESENTED

The Fifth Circuit held that the district judge in this tobacco products liability suit abused his discretion in declining to disqualify himself. The panel reasoned that nearly a decade before, while the district judge was in private practice, his name had been mistakenly listed, along with that of one of the plaintiff's attorneys in this case, on a voluntary bar association's three-sentence pro forma motion to file an amicus brief in a different tobacco suit in state court. The panel explicitly gave no weight to critical uncontested facts, including particularly that the judge's name had been listed by someone else by mistake and that he had never had anything to do with the case in which the motion was filed. In addition, (i) the motion said nothing about the merits of tobacco litigation; and (ii) the judge had never been involved in any tobacco litigation nor litigated any matter with plaintiff's counsel during his entire three-decade career as a private attorney.

In "vigorously" dissenting from the Fifth Circuit's denial of rehearing en banc by an evenly divided vote, six judges wrote that the panel's decision "disregards the unanimous voices of other U.S. Courts of Appeals that have addressed the issue," "dangerously erodes the discretion that Congress has assigned to federal judges in matters of recusal while opening a new, broad avenue for litigants to avoid appearing before a judge they perceive to be unfairly disinclined to favor their side in this case," and presents an issue that "cuts across ideology, politics, and judicial philosophy."

The Question Presented is:

Did the Fifth Circuit err in adopting a new legal standard for recusal that, whenever a district judge is mistakenly asserted to have had a "pre-judicial association" with a position or counsel, the judge's failure to disqualify himself is an abuse of discretion as a matter of law because a third party "might" erroneously perceive the judge as biased?

OPINIONS BELOW

The District Court's opinion (Pet. App. 40a-47a) (Barbier, J.) is unreported. The Fifth Circuit's per curiam opinion reversing (Pet. App. 17a-25a) (Garza and Stewart, JJ.; Parker, J., specially concurring) is published at 250 F.3d 315. The court of appeals' order denying rehearing and rehearing en banc (Pet. App. 1a-16a) (dissent per Wiener and Parker, JJ., jointly, joined by King, C.J., and Higginbotham, Davis, and Dennis, JJ.) is published at 265 F.3d 299.

RELEVANT STATUTORY PROVISIONS

28 U.S.C. § 455(a) provides: "Any justice, judge, or magistrate of the United States shall disqualify himself in any proceeding in which his impartiality might reasonably be questioned."

JURISDICTION

The panel entered its opinion on May 14, 2001, and the court denied rehearing and rehearing en banc on September 5, 2001. This Court's jurisdiction rests on 28 U.S.C. § 1254(1).

STATEMENT

This case presents a question of profound importance that merits certiorari both because it raises square conflicts with decisions of this Court and other circuits and because it directly implicates this Court's supervisory responsibility for the federal judiciary. The Fifth Circuit – departing radically from decades of uninterrupted precedent in other circuits – held that a judge abuses his discretion as a matter of law by not disqualifying himself whenever he is mistakenly believed to have a pre-judicial association with a particular legal position relevant to the case or a party's lawyer. The court of appeals reasoned that, in these circumstances, a member of the public "might" erroneously doubt the judge's impartiality.

As six judges explained at length in dissenting from the denial of rehearing en banc, the legal basis for such an extraordinary holding has been uniformly rejected by other circuits and, indeed, stands alone in "the history of American jurisprudence." Pet. App. 4a.

I. Proceedings in the District Court

Petitioner Sao Paulo State of the Federative Republic of Brazil ("Petitioner") originally filed this tobacco products liability suit in Louisiana state court in February 2000. The next month, the defendant tobacco companies ("Respondents") removed the case to the United States District Court for the Eastern District of Louisiana, where it was randomly assigned to District Judge Barbier. Petitioner promptly moved to remand the case to state court. Respondents moved to stay the case pending a determination by the panel on multidistrict litigation whether the case should be transferred to another district court as a "tag along" matter.

Respondents also moved to disqualify Judge Barbier on the same ground they had invoked in a parallel suit brought against them by the Republic of Panama. Respondents argued that eight years earlier, while the judge was in private practice, his name had appeared on a pro forma, three-sentence motion to file an amicus curiae brief in the Louisiana Supreme Court. See Pet. App. 55a-58a (reproducing the amicus motion). (For ease of understanding, we henceforth refer to the present case as the "Sao Paulo case," the Panama matter as the "Panama case," and the Louisiana state court suit as the "Gilboy case.") The amicus motion in Gilboy was filed by the Louisiana Trial Lawyers Association ("LTLA") and listed ten lawyers, including Barbier (erroneously identified as the President of the LTLA) and Michael St. Martin (one of the plaintiff's lawyers in this case). The motion said nothing at all about the merits of the Gilboy case. The amicus brief itself – on which Judge Barbier's name was not listed – argued that the tobacco industry should be held liable for deaths caused by lung cancer, arguments that were similar to those underlying the plaintiff's claims in the Sao Paulo case.

Respondents did not maintain that Judge Barbier was biased against them. E.g., Resp. Opp. to Rh'g En Banc 2 ("No claim or finding of actual bias was made."). Nor did Respondents maintain that the presence of Judge Barbier's name on the Gilboy motion implicated any of the provisions of 28 U.S.C. § 455(b), including particularly Section 455(b)(2), which requires disqualification when the judge "served as [a] lawyer in the matter in controversy, or a lawyer with whom he previously practiced law served during such association as a lawyer concerning the matter." Rather, Respondents maintained that Judge Barbier's involvement in the case created an "appearance of impropriety" that required disqualification under 28 U.S.C. § 455(a).

Judge Barbier, having previously denied the motion to disqualify in the Panama case, also denied the motion in the Sao Paulo case. See Pet. App. 43a (incorporating reasoning from district court's ruling in Panama). The Judge detailed "for the record" six reasons why there was no "appearance of impropriety" (see generally id. 48a-54a):

First, his name had been "mistakenly" placed on the Gilboy amicus motion without his knowledge or permission by some unknown person at the LTLA at a time when he "was not the president of the Louisiana Trial Lawyers Association," "having left that office in September [or] October of the previous year";

Second, he "had absolutely nothing to do with researching, writing, signing or approving this brief in any manner";

Third, his name appeared "on the motion for leave to file the amicus brief, not on the brief itself," which was the only document that contained assertions about the merits of tobacco litigation;

Fourth, he had "absolutely no personal knowledge of any of the disputed or alleged facts in the Gilboy case[;] None[;] Period," and indeed he could not even say "what the holding was in that case, what the real issue was";

Fifth, he had "never taken or expressed any position or opinion regarding the tobacco industry or any of the issues raised in this litigation"; and

Sixth, he had "never been associated in legal practice or in any case with any of the other lawyers listed [on the Gilboy motion] or the lawyers in this case."

Judge Barbier furthermore explained that, even putting those six undisputed facts to the side, accepting Respondents' argument that disqualification is required in any case of prejudicial association with a particular legal position "would open the door to Pandora's box." Pet. App. 54a. "[A]fter practicing law for 28 or 29 years, I have taken many different positions on different legal issues that, I guess, any party in any case could find a brief or a lawsuit or a memoranda that I filed somewhere along the way, and if they thought it conflicted with a position involving their client in a case now, that would open every judge in this court to recusal on a Pandora's box of issues." Id.

Having previously remanded the Panama case to state court, the Judge also remanded the Sao Paulo case. Pet. App. 44a-47a. The judge also denied Respondents' request that he stay the case pending a determination by the panel on multidistrict litigation whether the Sao Paulo case should be deemed a "tag along" case and therefore transferred. Id. 41a-43a. Judge Barbier explained that the MDL panel had made clear that district courts should act on pending motions (such as Petitioner's remand motion) rather than awaiting the panel's procedural rulings, and that even "defendants in their papers filed with the Court seem to grudgingly acknowledge that the foregoing is the law." Id. 42a.

II. Proceedings Before the Fifth Circuit Panel

Respondents could not appeal the district court's remand order. See 28 U.S.C. § 1447. They nonetheless appealed Judge Barbier's denial of their disqualification motion, asserting that the district court's subsequent remand order was void on that basis. While that appeal was pending, a panel of the Fifth Circuit reversed Judge Barbier's refusal to disqualify himself in the Panama case. See Pet. App. 29a-37a. Two of the same judges were assigned to the Sao Paulo appeal, and they reversed on the basis of their prior Panama ruling. See id. 19a. The third judge concurred on the ground that Panama was binding precedent but called on the full court to overrule that decision. See id. 20a-25a. On remand, the case was reassigned, at which point it was not remanded to state court but instead was transferred by the panel on multidistrict litigation to the District Court for the District of Columbia, where it is still pending.

The Panama decision holds that Judge Barbier abused his discretion in not disqualifying himself because his name was on the Gilboy amicus motion along with the name of one of Petitioner's counsel. Addressing the Gilboy amicus brief, the panel acknowledged that "the facts of the [Gilboy] suit and the present suit may be distinguishable." Pet. App. 35a. The panel noted, however, that the LTLA's amicus brief "contained general statements about tobacco companies" – particularly that "tobacco use is addictive" and that "tobacco companies should be held liable because they were negligent" – that are "similar[]" to the assertions underlying the complaints in the Panama and Sao Paulo cases. Id.

The panel set out its legal standard as follows: "In the present case, while there is no evidence of actual bias, we must consider whether a reasonable person might harbor doubts about the trial judge's impartiality." Pet. App. 36a (emphasis added). Under that lenient standard, the court concluded that the judge's refusal to disqualify himself violated Section 455(a):

> The fact that Judge Barbier's name was listed on a motion to file an amicus brief which asserted similar allegations against tobacco companies to the ones made in this case may lead a reasonable person to doubt his impartiality. Also, Judge Barbier was listed on this filing with the attorney who is currently representing the Republic of Panama.

Id. The panel furthermore concluded that this supposed violation of Section 455(a) was per se an abuse of discretion: "[W]e hold that a reasonable person might harbor doubts about the trial judge's impartiality, and thus the district court abused its discretion in denying the defendants' motion to recuse." Id. 37a (emphasis added).

Significantly, the court gave no weight to any factors other than those underlying Respondents' allegations of an appearance of bias. The panel acknowledged Judge Barbier's uncontested, on-the-record representations that his name had been "placed on the motion by mistake" and that "his term as president of LTLA had ended by the time the brief was filed, and that he had nothing to do with the researching, writing, signing, or approval of the brief." Pet. App. 35a. But the court concluded that these uncontested representations "do not dissipate the doubts that a reasonable person would probably have about the court's impartiality." Id. 36a. The court also gave no weight to the fact that, for example, Judge Barbier had never been involved in tobacco litigation in his entire career and that the motion had been filed nearly a decade ago. See supra at 3-4.

The panel acknowledged that it could not identify any decision that had required recusal in similar circumstances, but it nonetheless held that Judge Barbier's decision was an abuse of discretion in light of Bradshaw v. McCotter, 785 F.2d 1327, modified on reh'g, 796 F.2d 100 (CA5 1986). See Pet. App. 35a-36a. Bradshaw held on federal habeas that a criminal defendant's right to due process was implicated when his state appeal was heard by a panel that included a judge who had until very recently served as the State Prosecuting Attorney and whose name appeared as counsel for the State in the defendant's own appeal. The judge had not in fact worked on the defendant's case. The Fifth Circuit held, however, that "[t]he appearance of [the judge's] name on the prosecuting attorney's brief undermined a fundamental aspect of our criminal justice system: a judge's neutrality. The separation between the roles of prosecutor and judge must be certain and inflexible." 785 F.2d at 1329.

The panel in the Panama case conceded that, even under its lenient legal standard, "this is a close case for recusal." Pet. App. 36a. But it determined that "if the question of whether § 455(a) requires disqualification is a close one the balance tips in favor of recusal." Id. The panel accordingly reversed the denial of the motion to disqualify and, on that basis, vacated the district court's order remanding the case to state court. Id. 39a.[1]

[1] The Fifth Circuit correctly did not accept Respondents' contention that other factors supposedly bolstered the basis for requiring disqualification. Although Respondents argued that the arguments in the LTLA amicus brief were inflammatory and closely related to those in the Panama and Sao Paulo cases, the panel correctly recognized that Gilboy "may be distinguishable" and merely contained "general statements" that are "similar" to the allegations in this case. Pet. App. 35a-36a. The Fifth Circuit also did not accept Respondents' reliance on the fact that some of the defendant tobacco companies here were also defendants in Gilboy, no doubt because the same defendants are named in essentially every tobacco suit and no special allegations were made as to the overlapping defendants. The panel did not rely on the allegation that Judge Barbier was an officer of the LTLA when the Gilboy amicus brief was filed, reasoning that would impute disqualification to every judge who previously served as an officer of any association that took a substantive position. Finally, the panel did not accept Respondents' inexplicable contention that disqualification is required on the basis of any pre-judicial position taken in the course of pro bono service rather than paid representation. Because the Fifth Circuit did not rely on those contentions, they are not relevant to the legal conflicts created by the decision below and accordingly will not be discussed further.

Judge Parker concurred specially in this case to argue that, although the Panama decision was controlling precedent within the Fifth Circuit, it "was wrongly decided" and should be reversed en banc. Pet. App. 20a. He concluded that the facts on the public record "are simply too tenuous to support any reasonable basis for questioning the judge's impartiality, and even if these facts clearly raise the issue of impartiality, it is error to conclude that the judge abused his sound discretion in denying the motion for recusal." Id. Judge Parker also explained that the panel's decision conflicts with decisions of the Third, Fourth, and Eleventh Circuits, as well as with considered opinions written by the Chief Justice and Judge Posner concluding that their own recusals were not required in analogous circumstances. Id. 21a-25a.

III. Dissent from the Denial of Rehearing En Banc

Notwithstanding Judge Parker's clear identification of the conflicts created by the panel's decision, Petitioner's suggestion of rehearing en banc failed by an evenly divided vote. Pet. App. 3a. In a joint opinion by Judges Wiener and Parker, six judges wrote to "respectfully but vigorously dissent." Id. 4a. The dissenters set forth their views at length "not merely because [they viewed] the panel opinion as wrongly decided, but because the nature of the error committed * * * dangerously erodes the discretion that Congress has assigned to federal judges in matters of recusal while opening a new, broad avenue for litigants to avoid appearing before a judge they perceive to be unfairly disinclined to favor their side of the case." Id. 4a-5a.

The dissenters explained that the panel majority's legal holding rested on the proposition "that any judge who had a 'pre-judicial association with the position' – not with the parties, not with the lawyers, but with a 'position' – can never fairly decide a case that raises questions pertaining to that 'position.'" Pet. App. 8a. Such a holding "clearly called into question the oath we take when we become federal judges" and furthermore logically "launch[ed] a cottage industry in which investigators will comb the contents of speeches made, articles written, and pleadings and briefs filed by a judge prior to his taking of that oath, looking for some trace of evidence suggesting that, prior to his judgeship, the judge held views on legal questions that can be used to disqualify him from hearing cases that implicate such matters." Id. 9a.

Amplifying Judge Parker's prior panel concurrence, the dissenters explained that "the panel opinion disregards the unanimous voices of other U.S. Courts of Appeals that have addressed the issue." Pet. App. 13a. In particular, the decision conflicted with rulings of the Third, Seventh, Ninth, and Eleventh Circuits, as well as the recusal opinions of the Chief Justice and Judge Posner. Id. 13a-15a.

Finding "no legitimate basis for disturbing the Judge's exercise of discretion in this case," the dissenters closed with an emphatic statement of the importance of the question presented, particularly with respect to the court's adoption of the principle of "issue recusal":

> We are satisfied that this issue cuts across ideology, politics, and judicial philosophy, and that it has the potential for undermining the independence of the federal judiciary. No existing jurisprudence supports, much less requires, recusal of a judge who, years before taking the judicial oath, had expressed an opinion on an issue of law, or had represented the same or a related party, or had belonged to and held office in an organization that advocated a particular view of public policy or legal interpretation. Never before has any court accepted "issue recusal" as a ground for reversing a judge who in his own exercise of discretion, concluded that his recusal was not required. The panel decision that this court has refused to rehear en banc sets an alarming precedent by doing precisely that, and trivializes our oath in the process.

Pet. App. 16a (emphasis added).[2]

REASONS FOR GRANTING THE WRIT

Certiorari is warranted in this case on several grounds.

I. The decision below conflicts with two of this Court's precedents. First, Liteky v. United States, 510 U.S. 540 (1994), holds that Section 455(a) must not be read "as implicitly eliminating a limitation explicitly set forth in § 455(b)." 510 U.S. at 553. The Fifth Circuit's decision, however, contravenes that rule. Section 455(b)(2) provides that recusal is required when the judge, while in private practice, "served as [a] lawyer in the matter in controversy, or a lawyer with whom he previously practiced law served during such association as a lawyer concerning the matter." Although Respondents' allegations are similar to those covered by Section 455(b)(2), there is no dispute that Judge Barbier's recusal is not required under that provision because Gilboy is not "the matter in controversy," Judge Barbier did not actually "serve[] as [a] lawyer" in Gilboy, and Judge Barbier did not "previously practice[] law" with any of the plaintiff's counsel in this case. The Fifth Circuit's decision, however, reads Section 455(a) to require recusal so broadly that henceforth no party will ever resort to Section 455(b)(2). Furthermore, the Fifth Circuit's holding that disqualification is mandatory based even on the extraordinarily attenuated allegations in this case cannot be reconciled with Liteky's holding that Section 455(a) does not demand a "sort of 'child-like innocence'" from district judges (510 U.S. at 552).

Second, Liljeberg v. Health Services Acquisition Corp., 486 U.S. 847, 860 (1988), holds that disqualification is required under Section 455(a) only if "the public might reasonably believe" that the judge "knew of facts creating an appearance of impropriety." No member of the public could possibly reach that conclusion in this case because any person who considered the matter would know that Judge Barbier had never been involved in Gilboy or any other tobacco products liability case.

[2] As if to illustrate the point that this issue "cuts across ideology, politics, and judicial philosophy" (Pet. App. 16a), the dissenters' opinion was issued jointly by appointees of Presidents Bush and Clinton and was joined by appointees of Presidents Carter, Reagan, and Clinton.

The decision below furthermore conflicts with Liljeberg's holding that, even once a violation of Section 455(a) is identified, the court of appeals must consider whether that violation is "harmless error." 486 U.S. at 862. If a violation of Section 455(a) was ever harmless, this one was. The alleged "appearance of impropriety" in this case was said to arise from Judge Barbier's deciding the merits of a tobacco products liability case. But Judge Barbier never considered the merits. He only considered one question: whether to remand to state court or instead to stay the case until a ruling by the panel on multidistrict litigation. The Fifth Circuit's decision only served to vacate Judge Barbier's remand order. Respondents' disqualification motion thus did not further Section 455(a)'s purpose of preserving public confidence in the judicial process, but rather served only to manipulate that process by circumventing the statutory prohibition on appealing remand decisions.

II. Certiorari is also warranted because the decision below conflicts with decisions of other circuits, which categorically reject three legal propositions embraced by the Fifth Circuit. First, several courts of appeals have squarely held that Section 455(a) is not implicated when the request for recusal rests on false information and the judge has set forth the actual facts on the record. Those courts reason that Section 455 requires an inquiry into the view that a "reasonable person" would have if that person knew "all the facts." In those circuits, the denial of recusal in this case would have been affirmed because Judge Barbier clearly explained for the record that the allegations supposedly giving rise to an appearance of impropriety are false.

Second, several circuits have squarely rejected the Fifth Circuit's holding that a judge's "pre-judicial association" with a "position" requires disqualification. Those courts reason that a breadth of pre-judicial experience is a virtue, not a vice, and that the public recognizes that judges will abide by their solemn oaths to decide cases without bias or predisposition. In those circuits, the denial of recusal in this case would have been affirmed (even if Judge Barbier had been involved in Gilboy) because his participation in a single tobacco suit almost a decade earlier could not reasonably be said to call his impartiality into question.

Third, several circuits reject the exceedingly lenient legal standard adopted by the Fifth Circuit for holding that Section 455(a) is violated and that the failure to remedy the violation is an abuse of discretion – viz., that "a reasonable person might harbor doubts about [the judge's] impartiality." Pet. App. 36a (emphasis added). A number of circuits hold that Section 455(a) is not implicated unless a reasonable person actually "would" have such doubts. In addition, several circuits impose a still more stringent test in appeals that (like this one) are subject to the "abuse of discretion" standard of review, requiring that the district judge's failure to disqualify himself constitute at least a "clear error of judgment." There can be no dispute that these conflicting legal standards are outcome determinative here because the panel majority conceded that even under its sweeping legal test "this is a close case for recusal" (Pet. App. 36a).

III. These clear conflicts refute any suggestion that the question presented is fact-bound and unlikely to recur. Similar allegations could arise in any case on any subject. To be sure, every case involving Section 455 is, in one sense, "extremely fact intensive and fact bound." Pet. App. 34a. But that is simply another way of saying that careful attention must be paid to the facts supposedly requiring disqualification; it does not mean that no case involving disqualification ever merits review in this Court. To the contrary, certiorari is warranted here because the circuits have adopted irreconcilable legal standards under Section 455, such that their analysis of the same facts would produce conflicting results. Particularly given that the court of appeals refused to reverse its decision notwithstanding the clear legal conflicts identified by six dissenting judges, the Fifth Circuit is plainly committed to charting its own course with its exceedingly expansive approach to judicial disqualification.

Nor can it reasonably be disputed that the decision below will, at the least, invite a substantial disruption of the judicial process. In light of the Fifth Circuit's holding that Judge Barbier abused his discretion in declining to recuse himself on these extremely attenuated allegations, litigants know that much more common circumstances – such as when the judge actually participated in related litigation or expressed views on the subject of the case – will a fortiori require disqualification. As six judges correctly predicted in dissenting from the denial of rehearing en banc, the Fifth Circuit's precedent "launch[es] a cottage industry in which investigators will comb the contents of speeches made, articles written, and pleadings and briefs filed by a judge prior to his taking of [the] oath, looking for some trace of evidence suggesting that, prior to his judgeship, the judge held views on legal questions that can be used to disqualify him from hearing cases that implicate such matters." Pet. App. 9a. Judge Barbier was no doubt correct in similarly describing Respondents' position as opening "Pandora's box." Id. 54a.

Certiorari accordingly should be granted.

I. The Decision Below Conflicts With This Court's Precedents.

A. Liteky v. United States

In Liteky v. United States, 510 U.S. 540 (1994), this Court held that Section 455(a) incorporates the "extra-judicial source doctrine" that a demand for disqualification must rest on factors unrelated to the judicial proceedings. The Court's decision rested substantially on the relationship between Sections 455(a) and (b). The extra-judicial source doctrine applies under Section 455(b)(1), which applies in cases of "personal bias or prejudice concerning a party." This Court reasoned that "[d]eclining to find in the language of § 455(a) a limitation which (petitioners acknowledge) is contained in the language of § 455(b)(1) would cause the statute, in a significant sense, to contradict itself":

> As we have described, § 455(a) expands the protection of § 455(b), but duplicates some of its protection as well – not only with regard to bias and prejudice but also with regard to interest and relationship. Within the area of overlap, it is unreasonable to interpret § 455(a) (unless the language requires it) as implicitly eliminating a limitation explicitly set forth in § 455(b). It would obviously be wrong, for example, to hold that "impartiality could reasonably be questioned" simply because one of the parties is in the fourth degree of relationship to the judge. Section 455(b)(5), which addresses the matter of relationship specifically, ends the disability at the third degree of relationship, and that should obviously govern for purposes of § 455(a) as well. Similarly, § 455(b)(1), which addresses the matter of personal bias and prejudice specifically, contains the "extra-judicial source" limitation – and that limitation (since nothing in the text contradicts it) should govern for purposes of § 455(a) as well.

510 U.S. at 552-53. In an accompanying footnote, the Court reiterated that "when one of those aspects addressed in (b) is at issue, it is poor statutory construction to interpret (a) as nullifying the limitations (b) provides, except to the extent the text requires." Id. at 553 n.2.[3]

[3] For other decisions recognizing this relationship between Sections 455(a) and (b), see, e.g., Ven eklase v. City of Fargo, 236 F.3d 899, 901-02 (CA8 2000) (opinion of Bye, J., respecting recusal); Herrington v. County of Sonoma, 834 F.2d 1488, 1501-03 (CA9 1987); United States v. Sibla, 624 F.2d 864, 867-69 (CA9 1980).

The Fifth Circuit's decision in this case construes Section 455(a) in exactly the manner that Liteky expressly disapproves. Congress addressed the circumstances in which an appearance of impropriety would arise from a pre-judicial participation in litigation or association with counsel – precisely the concerns raised by Respondents' disqualification motion – in Section 455(b)(2), which requires recusal when the judge while "in private practice • • • served as [a] lawyer in the matter in controversy, or a lawyer with whom he previously practiced law served during such association as a lawyer concerning the matter." The Fifth Circuit, however, has construed Section 455(a) "as implicitly eliminating a limitation explicitly set forth in § 455(b)" (Liteky, 510 U.S. at 553) because Respondents' allegations fail to trigger Section 455(b)(2) in three independent respects: Gilboy is not "the matter in controversy" here; Judge Barbier did not actually "serve[] as [a] lawyer" in Gilboy; and Judge Barbier did not "previously practice[] law" with any of the plaintiff's counsel in this case. The Fifth Circuit nonetheless read such extraordinary breadth into Section 455(a) that henceforth no party will ever have cause to invoke Section 455(b)(2). According to the decision below, Section 455(a) mandates disqualification whenever the district judge participated in a case with "similar" allegations (as opposed to the same case) and served as co-counsel with a party's lawyer (as opposed to in the same law firm). Moreover, under the Fifth Circuit's holding, disqualification is required even when the public record shows that the allegation of pre-judicial participation is false, a circumstance that would not trigger Section 455(b). Liteky instructs that Congress could not have intended to obliterate the limitations of Section 455(b) in that fashion.

The decision below is furthermore inconsistent with this Court's conclusion in Liteky that Section 455(a) limits the scope of the judicial disqualification because it applies only when the judge's impartiality could reasonably be questioned. The plain meaning of "partiality," the Court explained, carries an important "pejorative connotation." 510 U.S. at 552.

"'Partiality' does not refer to all favoritism, but only to such as is, for some reason, wrongful or inappropriate. Impartiality is not gullibility." Id. The term "reasonableness" carries the same connotation because it would be "unreasonable" to require judges to exhibit a "sort of 'child-like innocence.'" Id. Justice Kennedy, in a concurring opinion for himself and Justices Blackmun, Stevens, and Souter, similarly expressed the view that Section 455(a) must be construed narrowly: "I think all would agree that a high threshold is required to satisfy this standard. Thus, under § 455(a), a judge should be disqualified only if it appears that he or she harbors an aversion, hostility or disposition of a kind that a fair-minded person could not set aside when judging the dispute." 510 U.S. at 558. The Fifth Circuit's holding that Judge Barbier abused his discretion in refusing to disqualify himself in this case, however, rests on an extraordinarily attenuated relationship between the Gilboy amicus brief, in which Judge Barbier was not actually involved and which was filed almost a decade earlier, and this case. Finding disqualification on these facts demands precisely the "child-like innocence" that Liteky holds is not required by the statute.

B. Liljeberg v. Health Services Acquisition Corp.

In Liljeberg v. Health Services Acquisition Corp., 486 U.S. 847 (1988), this Court held that an egregious violation of Section 455(a) required that a district court's judgment be vacated so long as the judge should have known of the facts giving rise to the appearance of bias. The Court concluded that, although Section 455(a) did not require that the judge "actually knew of facts creating an appearance of impropriety," the statute was triggered only if "the public might reasonably believe that he or she knew." 486 U.S. at 860. The Court reasoned that the statute looks to whether a member of the public, aware of all the relevant facts, would conclude that factors within the judge's consciousness would affect his judgment. Id. The Fifth Circuit's decision in this case, however, disregards that important limitation on the scope of Section 455(a). Manifestly, no reasonably informed member of the public could believe that Judge Barbier would be influenced by his participation in the Gilboy case, because any person who looks at the record knows beyond peradventure that Judge Barbier did not actually participate in that tobacco products liability case or any other.

The Fifth Circuit's decision conflicts with Liljeberg in another important respect. Even after concluding that the judge's conduct violated Section 455(a), this Court instructed that "[a]s in other areas of the law, there is surely room for harmless error" and that "[t]here need not be a draconian remedy for every violation of § 455(a)." 486 U.S. at 862. Affording "due consideration" to the court of appeals' decision, this Court held that it was appropriate to vacate the district court's judgment in that case because the judge's conduct was, in several important respects, serious and "inexcusable." Id. at 865-67. When "[t]he violation is neither insubstantial nor excusable," a court is faced with "precisely the kind of appearance of impropriety that § 455(a) was intended to prevent," and it is appropriate to vacate the district court's judgment. Id. at 867. Moreover, the Court reasoned that vacatur on those facts "may prevent a substantive injustice in some future case by encouraging a judge or litigant to more carefully examine possible grounds for disqualification and to promptly disclose them when discovered." Id. at 868.

The Fifth Circuit's application of Section 455(a) to vacate the district court's remand order in this case produces precisely the opposite result. If there were ever a "harmless" violation of Section 455(a) – entertaining the assumption that the statute had in fact been violated here – this is it. The appearance of impropriety is said to arise from Judge Barbier's deciding the merits of a tobacco products liability suit after having participated in Gilboy. But Judge Barbier never considered the merits of this case: the only question he ever addressed was whether to send the case back to state court or instead to stay it pending a ruling by the panel on multidistrict litigation. Nothing about the Gilboy case could reasonably be said to cloud Judge Barbier's choice between those two options. Respondents' disqualification motion thus did not serve Section 455(a)'s purpose of encouraging public confidence in the judicial process but rather served only to manipulate that process by circumventing the statutory prohibition on appealing remand decisions. Nor, of course, could there be any prophylactic benefit to vacating the district court's decision in this case – in contrast to Liljeberg, judges cannot be expected to become more attentive to disqualification based on events that (like Judge Barbier's alleged participation in Gilboy) never actually happened.[4]

Because the decision below conflicts with this Court's precedents, certiorari should be granted.

II. The Decision Below Conflicts With Decisions Of Other Circuits And Well-Reasoned Opinions Of Respected Jurists.

A. Other Circuits Hold That Disqualification Is Not Required When the Public Record Dissipates the Appearance of Impropriety.

The Fifth Circuit's holding that Judge Barbier abused his discretion in not disqualifying himself rests on the view that a member of the public might mistakenly perceive Judge Barbier as biased. The impermissible appearance in this case is said to arise from the fact that Judge Barbier, with one of the plaintiff's lawyers in this case, supposedly endorsed a three-sentence, pro forma motion supporting an amicus brief in another tobacco suit. In reality, that never happened – Judge Barbier detailed "on the record" that his name was mistakenly placed on the motion and that he had nothing to do with it or the accompanying brief. The Fifth Circuit nonetheless explicitly rejected the proposition that these uncontested representations by the judge "dissipate[d]" the "appearance of impropriety." Pet. App. 36a.

[4] The Chief Justice and Justices White, O'Connor, and Scalia dissented in Liljeberg on the ground that Section 455(a) did not require disqualification and the vacatur of the district court's judgment on even the much more extreme facts of that case. See 486 U.S. at 870 (Rehnquist, C.J., dissenting); id. at 874 (O'Connor,J. , dissenting).

Other circuits squarely reject that conclusion. Those courts hold, as a matter of law, that a disqualification motion under Section 455(a) must be evaluated according to all the actual facts as they appear on the record. In other words, disqualification must be gauged from the perspective of the proverbial "reasonable person" – someone who takes the time to consider all the facts that the judge places on the record – rather than from the perspective of the heretofore-unknown bizarre recluse who refuses to read anything other than the signature blocks on decade-old motions to file amicus briefs in the Louisiana Supreme Court. Among other things, other circuits note that the statute, in Section 455(e), expressly contemplates that the judge will create a factual record on the asserted bases for disqualification. See 28 U.S.C. § 455(e) ("Where the ground for disqualification arises only under subsection (a), waiver [of the appearance of impropriety] may be accepted provided it is preceded by a full disclosure on the record of the basis for disqualification."). Decisions of the First Circuit illustrate the point particularly well.

In In re United States, 666 F.2d 690 (1981), the First Circuit refused to reverse a district judge's decision not to recuse himself from the trial of a state official with whom the judge, while a government attorney, had worked on a related investigation. The press had carried a variety of allegations regarding the judge's relationship with the defendant, some of which were true but a number of which were overstated or false. The court of appeals set "ground rules" to ensure that Section 455(a) would be applied only when there was an actual basis in fact, lest "the price of maintaining the purity of appearance * * * be the power of litigants or third parties to exercise a negative veto over the assignment of judges":

> First, a charge of partiality must be supported by a factual basis. Although public confidence may be as much shaken by publicized inferences of bias that are false as by those that are true, a judge considering whether to disqualify himself must ignore rumors, innuendos, and erroneous information published as fact in the newspapers. * * * Second, disqualification is appropriate only if the facts provide what an objective, knowledgeable member of the public would find to be a reasonable basis for doubting the judge's impartiality. Were less required, a judge could abdicate in difficult cases at the mere sound of controversy or a litigant could avoid adverse decisions by alleging the slightest of factual bases for bias. This restricted mandate to disqualify is calculated to induce a judge to tread the narrow path between timidity and tenacity.

666 F.2d at 694-95 (emphasis added).

The First Circuit applied that holding once again in El Fenix de Puerto Rico v. The M/Y Johanny, 36 F.3d 136 (1994), in which a party sought disqualification on the ground that the judge had invited a third party knowledgeable about the issues raised by the case to listen to the testimony, creating the impression that the judge might have intended to consult with that third party about the evidence. The district judge explained on the record that his decision "was based exclusively on the evidence presented by both parties." 36 F.3d at 140. The court of appeals held that these representations made Section 455(a) categorically inapplicable: "[Because the movant] challenges none of the findings underlying the recusal order * * * the motion for disqualification under 28 U.S.C. § 455(a) should have been denied." Id. The court explained that recusal is inappropriate when "the district judge was in a position to debunk the innuendo underlying" the movant's allegations:

> No permissible reading of subsection 455(a) would suggest that Congress intended to allow a litigant to > compel disqualification simply on unfounded innuendo concerning the possible partiality of the presiding judge.

> The proper approach under subsection 455(e) requires the trial judge to place on the record all the facts relating to any alleged appearance of lack of impartiality and then leave entirely to the parties whether to waive disqualification under section 455(a).

Id. at 140-41.[5]

Other circuits have long adopted the same clear legal holding. As the Second Circuit concluded in In re Drexel Burnham Lambert, 861 F.2d 1307, 1313 (CA2 1988), "Like all legal issues, judges determine appearance of impropriety–not by considering what a straw poll of the only partly informed man-in-the-street would show–but by examining the record facts and the law, and then deciding whether a reasonable person knowing and understanding all the relevant facts would recuse the judge." See also, e.g., David v. City & County of Denver, 101 F.3d 1344, 1351 (CA10 1996) ("In today's era of crowded dockets, recusal has become more complicated. Although the test in this circuit is one of reasonableness, it is reasonableness tempered with a knowledge of the relevant facts."); Voigt v. Savell, 70 F.3d 1552, 1556 (CA9 1995) (holding that district judge (who was former state court judge) did not abuse his discretion in denying motion to recuse himself from suit against state court officials in light of judge's on-the-record explanation of all facts and circumstances: "A reasonable person informed of the foregoing facts would not conclude that Judge Singleton's impartiality might reasonably be questioned."); United States v. Dandy, 998 F.2d 1344, 1349 (CA6 1993) (holding that recusal was not required because district judge detailed that allegations he had long-time close relationship with important witness were incorrect); Wu v. Thomas, 996 F.2d 271, 275 (CA11 1993) (holding disqualification not required on the basis of district judge's close ties to defendant university because judge explained that he had no substantial financial relationship and, "[o]n these facts (which are uncontested), no reasonable observer would assume that Judge Guin had extra-judicial knowledge of this case or otherwise question Judge Guin's impartiality"); United States v. Greenough, 782 F.2d 1556, 1558 (CA11 1986) (adopting First Circuit's holding in In re United States, supra); United States v. Story, 716 F.2d 1088, 1091 (CA6 1983) (holding that, although allegations of bias were facially plausible, "[w]ith more facts available from the district court's opinion, it is clear that there are no reasonable grounds to question the judge's impartiality").

A trial judge must hear cases unless some reasonable factual basis to doubt the impartiality or fairness of the tribunal is shown by some kind of probative evidence.").

The Chief Justice also made precisely this point in his separate statement regarding recusal in Microsoft Corp. v. United States, 530 U.S. 1301, 121 S. Ct. 25 (2000). It had been reported that the Chief Justice's son represented Microsoft in other litigation. After "review[ing] the relevant legal authorities and consult[ing] with [his] colleagues," however, the Chief Justice determined that disqualification was not appropriate or required. 121 S. Ct. at 26. In particular, he detailed for the record why his son's interests would not, in fact, be affected by the Supreme Court's ruling. "Given that the inquiry under Section 455(a) 'is an objective one, made from the perspective of a reasonable observer who is informed of all the surrounding facts and circumstances,'" the Chief Justice explained that no appearance of impropriety could arise because "I have already explained that my son's personal and financial concerns will not be affected by our disposition of the Supreme Court's Microsoft matters." Id. (emphasis added) (citations omitted).

Relatedly, other circuits would reject the Fifth Circuit's singular focus on the Respondents' allegations of partiality, as opposed to all the relevant facts and circumstances that would be known by a fully informed member of the public. Those courts manifestly would not find that disqualification was required in this case in light of numerous circumstances that the Fifth Circuit found irrelevant. Among other things: the Gilboy motion was filed nearly a decade before this case arose; Judge Barbier had never participated in tobacco litigation in his entire career; Judge Barbier had never litigated any matter with the plaintiff's counsel in this case; the LTLA is a voluntary bar association not dedicated to tobacco litigation; the LTLA is not involved in this case; and Judge Barbier had no personal stake in any tobacco matters.

In United States v. DeTemple, 162 F.3d 279 (CA4 1998), a defendant alleged a variety of improprieties by the district judge, including that the judge as a private attorney had attempted to collect a debt from the defendant that was related to the criminal charges against him and that one of the judge's law clerks was married to the prosecutor. In refusing to find that the judge abused his discretion in not recusing himself, the court of appeals adopted the First Circuit's view in In re United States, supra, that the standard for requiring disqualification must be set high, lest the court "allow litigants to exercise a negative veto over the assignment of judges." 162 F.3d at 287. The court reasoned that, although the defendant's allegations "initially appear[] to raise a difficulty, examination of all of the facts and circumstances ultimately renders even this apparent conflict entirely benign." Id. A full examination of the record revealed that the judge's representation of the creditor had ended five years prior to the defendant's indictment and the clerk did not work on the case. Furthermore, members of the public would understand that other factors mitigated any impropriety, including that the case arose in a relatively small city in which it was more likely that a judge would previously have had "some tangential connection to a case subsequently assigned to him." Id. Nor was a different result required because the defendant had raised multiple supposed grounds for recusal: "any reasonable observer familiar with the facts of this case would recognize that the number of reasons DeTemple asserts as a basis for recusal reflects his ingenuity in finding conflicts around every corner rather than the merit of his claim." Id. at 288. See also Datagate v. Hewlett-Packard Co., 941 F.2d 864, 871 (CA9 1991) (adopting the approach of Hewlett-Packard Co. v. Bausch & Lomb, Inc., 882 F.2d 1556 (CAFC 1989), which held that, notwithstanding concerns raised by allegations of impropriety, "other facts mollify the situation").

B. Other Circuits Hold That a Pre-Judicial Association with a "Position" Is Not a Ground for Disqualification.

To hold that disqualification was required in this case, the Fifth Circuit adopted the principle of "issue recusal." The court of appeals concluded that an "appearance of impropriety" arose because the presence of Judge Barbier's name on the Gilboy motion associated him with the pro-plaintiff position taken by the LTLA in that tobacco products liability case. See Pet. App. 35a-36a. Moreover, the panel embraced an extraordinarily attenuated assertion of "issue recusal," requiring Judge Barbier's disqualification merely because the allegations in Gilboy, although they "may be distinguishable," contained "general statements" that were "similar" to those raised in this case. Id. As the dissenters from the denial of rehearing en banc explained, "Never before has any court accepted 'issue recusal' as a ground for reversing a judge who in his own exercise of discretion, concluded that his recusal was not required." Pet. App. 16a.

The plaintiffs in Cipollone v. Liggett Group, 802 F.2d 658, 659 (CA3 1986), sought the recusal of a member of the appellate panel on the ground that "while in private practice, [he] represented the American Tobacco Company in a case involving a similar products liability claim." The court of appeals refused: "If Judges could be disqualified because their background in the practice of law gave them knowledge of the legal issues which might be presented in cases coming before them, then only the least informed and worst-prepared lawyers could be appointed to the bench." 802 F.2d at 659-60. (It is noteworthy that Liggett and American Tobacco Company conveniently reverse course and take practically the opposite position here.)[6]

The First Circuit recently took the same view in United States v. Snyder:

> A judge's views on matters of law and policy ordinarily are not legitimate grounds for recusal, even if such views are strongly held. See RICHARD E. FLAMM, JUDICIAL DISQUALIFICATION: RECUSAL AND DISQUALIFICATION OF JUDGES § 10.2 (1996) (collecting cases). After all, judges commonly come to a case with personal views on the underlying subject matter; indeed, many judges are known to dislike aspects of the Sentencing Guidelines.

[6] The court of appeals also held that disqualification would not be appropriate even if American Tobacco Company were a party in the Cipollone action because "the long passage of time since Judge Hunter's last representation of that Company requires the conclusion that no reasonable person could question his impartiality." 802 F.2d at 659 (collecting cases). The same principle applies here given the nearly ten-year gap between the filing of the Gilboy brief and Judge Barbier's consideration of this case.

Relatedly, the Third Circuit would attach special significance to the fact that, even if the Gilboy motion demonstrated Judge Barbier's association with tobacco litigation, the Judge's tenure as President of the LTLA had ended by the time the motion was filed. See United States v. Di Pasquale, 864 F.2d 271 (1988) (disqualification not required notwithstanding that district judge was supervisory U.S. Attorney during prior investigation of same defendant on related conspiracy; court relies on judge's representation that period of service had ended by the time present investigation was undertaken); Edelstein v. Wilentz, 812 F.2d 128 (1987) (disqualification not required, notwithstanding that district judge previously served as director of agency that promulgated ethics rule which barred plaintiff's claim, because period of service had ended eight years earlier and prior to time rule was issued; court requires that reasonable person "would" perceive impropriety).

> Far from necessarily warranting recusal, typically such views merely mark an active mind. See Laird v. Tatum, 409 U.S. 824, 835 (1972) ("Proof that a [judge's] mind * * * was a complete tabula rasa * * * would be evidence of lack of qualification, not lack of bias."); John Leubsdorf, Theories of Judging and Judge Disqualification, 62 N.Y.U. L. REV. 237, 250-51 (1987) (discussing Judge Jerome Frank's statement that "if * * * bias and partiality be defined to mean the total absence of preconceptions in the mind of the judge, then no one has ever had a fair trial and no one ever will").

235 F.3d 42, 48 (2000). See also, e.g., Mitchael v. Intracorp, 179 F.3d 847, 861 (CA10 1999) (disqualification not required when district judge had previously represented same defendant insurers in insurance defense matters: "Reduced to its essence, that is what plaintiffs argue should cause Judge Belot to recuse [himself] from this case–familiarity with insurance defense work."); Rosquist v. Soo Line R.R., 692 F.2d 1107, 1112 (CA7 1982) ("[Plaintiffs' counsel] contends that the District Judge was biased on the issue of contingent attorney's fees and that prejudice prevented a fair determination of the fee. Judge Grady had, in the past, written and spoken on the subject of contingent fees. He was not required, however, to recuse himself merely because he holds and had expressed certain views on that general subject.").

Leading opinions from respected jurists have similarly rejected attempts to invoke "issue recusal." The best known of these is the Chief Justice's statement regarding recusal in Laird v. Tatum, 409 U.S. 824 (1972), in which he explained that his disqualification was not required by his previous testimony, while an official of the Department of Justice, on the subject matter of the Laird case and, in passing, Laird itself. Cautioning that the disqualification statute should not be read to "make a great deal of very little" (409 U.S. at 826), the Chief Justice found that the concept of "public-statement disqualification" has "little to commend [it] on the merits"

(id. at 833). "Proof that a Justice's mind at the time he joined the Court was a complete tabula rasa in the area of constitutional adjudication would be evidence of lack of qualification, not lack of bias." Id. at 835.[7]

Although Laird arose before the enactment of Section 455(a), the Chief Justice's rejection of "issue recusal" has subsequently been widely embraced, including notably by Judge Posner in Schurz Communications v. FCC, 982 F.2d 1057 (CA7 1992) (opinion respecting recusal). In that case, Judge Posner was asked to disqualify himself under Section 455(a) because, while in private practice, he had submitted an expert affidavit in a case that, like Schurz, involved "whether and how much the television networks should be restricted from participating in the production and distribution of television programs." 982 F.2d at 1059-60. Citing Laird and Cipollone, supra, Judge Posner concluded that recusal was inappropriate. He explained that "the standard under section 455(a)" is whether "anyone who troubles to equip himself with all the facts bearing on the circumstances of my participation in this and the 1977 proceeding" would find the facts an impediment to his ability to "judg[e] the present case impartially." Id. at 1061. Judge Posner explained that, if disqualification were required in those circumstances, "I would be eternally disqualified from participating in antitrust or regulatory cases, because when I was a law professor I acted frequently as a consultant and occasionally as an expert witness in regulatory and antitrust matters that presented the same types of issue, often in the same industry, as do the cases that come before this court. No decision supports such an interpretation." Id. at 1061. Accord Del Vecchio v. Illinois Dep't of Corrs., 31 F.3d 1363, 1389 (CA7 1994) (en banc) (Easterbrook, J., concurring) ("'Appearance' problems

[7] The Chief Justice found compelling the numerous instances in which members of this Courth ad notrec used themselves notwithstanding that they had spoken on, or been involved with, related matters prior to taking the bench. 409 U.S.at 831-34 (collecting examples).

lurk everywhere, for they are in the eye of the beholder. * * * A disqualification rule based on connections to lawyers and litigants would relieve a majority of this court of all cases involving the national government, because six of us formerly worked in the Department of Justice.").[8]

C. Other Circuits Impose a Higher Burden to Require Disqualification.

The legal standard applied by the Fifth Circuit in holding that Judge Barbier abused his discretion in refusing to disqualify himself conflicts with decisions of other circuits in two respects. The Fifth Circuit held not only that Section 455(a) mandates recusal whenever a reasonable person "might" doubt the judge's impartiality, but also that the failure of a judge to disqualify himself in that circumstance is per se an "abuse of discretion." According to the court of appeals, "[W]e hold that a reasonable person might harbor doubts about the trial judge's impartiality, and thus the district court abused its discretion in denying the defendants' motion to recuse." Pet. App. 37a (emphasis added). The circuits' conflicting standards are outcome determinative here because the Fifth Circuit determined that, even under its exceedingly lenient test, "this is a close case for recusal." Id. 36a.

Unlike the Fifth Circuit, the Eighth and Tenth Circuits hold that disqualification is appropriate under Section 455(a) only when a reasonable person actually "would" doubt the judge's impartiality. See Sac & Fox Nation v. Cuomo, 193 F.3d 1162, 1168 (CA10 1999) ("The court must decide 'whether a reasonable person, knowing all the relevant facts, would harbor doubts about the judge's impartiality.'" (quoting United States v. Cooley, 1 F.3d 985, 993 (CA10

[8] Justice Breyer similarly embraced the Chief Justice's views in Laird when, as a circuit judge also serving on the Sentencing Commission, he concluded that he generally would not recuse himself from sentencing cases. See United States v. Wright, 873 F.2d 437, 477 (CA1 1989).

1993))); O'Bannon v. Union Pac. R.R. Co., 169 F.3d 1088, 1091 (CA8 1991) ("Would the average person, knowing the facts alleged by the parties seeking disqualification, question the Judge's impartiality, and, if so, would the question be reasonable?").

Judge Tjoflat has succinctly stated the sound reasons underlying such a heightened standard: "If Congress had wanted judges to abandon all caution in deciding motions to recuse, they would have enacted a scheme of disqualification on demand." Carter v. West Publ'g Co., No. 99-11959-EE, 1999 U.S. App. LEXIS 38480, at *7 (CA11 Nov. 1, 1999). Judge Weinstein has similarly noted, "If misapplied * * * this statute can be used as a powerful tool by parties who wish to judge-shop." Disqualification of Judges (The Sarokin Matter): Is It a Threat to Judicial Independence?, 58 BROOK. L. REV. 1063, 1071 (1993) (panel discussion). See also H.R. Rep. No. 93-1453 (1974), reprinted in 1974 U.S.C.C.A.N. 6351, 6355 ("[I]n assessing the reasonableness of a challenge to his impartiality, each judge must be alert to avoid the possibility that those who would question his impartiality are in fact seeking to avoid the consequences of his expected adverse decision. Disqualification for lack of impartiality must have a reasonable basis. Nothing in this proposed legislation should be read to warrant the transformation of a litigant's fear that a judge may decide a question against him into a 'reasonable' fear that the judge will not be impartial. Litigants ought not have to face a judge where there is a reasonable question of impartiality, but they are not entitled to judges of their own choice."); RICHARD E. FLAMM, JUDICIAL DISQUALIFICATION § 24.2.3 (1996) ("[W]hile courts generally agree that § 455(a) broadens the grounds for judicial disqualification, that section is not to be so broadly construed that it becomes in effect presumptive. * * * The statute is not intended to give litigants a veto power over sitting judges or a vehicle for obtaining a judge of their choice * * *.").

Three circuits would furthermore reject the Fifth Circuit's holding that every erroneous denial of a Section 455(a) disqualification motion automatically constitutes an "abuse of discretion." See Pet. App. 37a. The First, Ninth, and Eleventh Circuits have given the "abuse of discretion" standard real teeth. In those courts, a district judge's failure to recuse himself under Section 455(a), even if erroneous, will not be reversed unless, at the very least, it constituted a "clear error of judgment." "[C]onsidering that the standard of review is abuse of discretion, we will affirm a district judge's refusal to recuse himself unless we conclude that the impropriety is clear and one which would be recognized by all objective, reasonable persons." United States v. F. Lee Bailey, 175 F.3d 966, 968 (CA11 1999). See also Datagate v. Hewlett-Packard Co., 941 F.2d 864 (CA9 1991) ("clear error of judgment"); United States v. Kelly, 888 F.2d 732 (CA11 1989) (same); In re United States, 666 F.2d at 695 ("The appellate court, therefore, must ask itself not whether it would have decided as did the trial court, but whether that decision cannot be defended as a rational conclusion supported by reasonable reading of the record." (emphasis added)).

Because the decision below conflicts with decisions of other circuits and well-reasoned opinions of respected jurists, certiorari should be granted.

CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons, the Petition for a Writ of Certiorari should be granted.

Appeal from the United States District Court
for the Eastern District of Louisiana

ON PETITION FOR REHEARING EN BANC
(Opinion May 14, 2001, 5th Cir., 2001, 250 F.3d 315)

Appendix A

Before EMILIO M. GARZA, STEWART and PARKER, Circuit Judges.

PER CURIAM:

Treating the Petition for Rehearing En Banc as a Petition for Panel Rehearing, the Petition for Panel Rehearing is DENIED. The Court having been polled at the request of one of the members of the court and a majority of the judges who are in regular active service not having voted in favor[1] (FED. R. APP. P. and 5TH CIR. R. 35), the Petition for Rehearing En Banc is DENIED.

1. Judge Barksdale and Judge Benavides did not participate in the consideration of the petition for rehearing en banc.

Appendix A

JACQUES L. WIENER and ROBERT M. PARKER, Circuit Judges, joined by CAROLYN DINEEN KING, PATRICK E. HIGGINBOTHAM, W. EUGENE DAVIS and JAMES L. DENNIS, Circuit Judges, dissenting from the Court's denial of the Petition for Rehearing En Banc:

The panel opinion for this case marks the first time in the history of American jurisprudence that an appellate court has reversed a trial judge's discretionary refusal to recuse himself — and has ordered the judge recused — based solely on the fact that many years earlier, while he was a practicing attorney, he had been linked (erroneously at that) with one view of a legal issue that was then pending in state court and only recently resurfaced in a case pending before him in federal court.[2] The Petition for Rehearing En Banc challenges the panel's holding that a federal district judge ("the Judge") abused his discretion by refusing to recuse himself pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 455(a), simply because he had been mistakenly identified, years before he became a judge, as having an "association with the legal position" now being espoused by one of the parties in a case pending before him.

The Petition for Panel Rehearing challenged the panel's holding that under those circumstances the Judge abused his discretion by not recusing himself pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 455(a). We respectfully but vigorously dissent from the refusal of a majority of the active judges of this court to rehear this matter en banc. We would have granted rehearing en banc, not merely because we view the panel opinion[3] as wrongly decided, but primarily because the nature of the error committed in pronouncing that result dangerously erodes the discretion that Congress has assigned to federal judges in matters of recusal while opening a new, broad avenue for litigants to avoid appearing before a judge they perceive to be unfairly disinclined to favor their side of a case.

FACTS AND PROCEDURAL HISTORY

In October 1998, the Republic of Panama filed suit alleging that the defendant tobacco companies conspired to conceal the addictiveness and health risks of tobacco and seeking compensation for health costs for diseases caused by smoking. Republic of Panama I, 217 F.3d at 344. The defendant tobacco companies removed the case to federal court. Id. at 345. In 1999, the tobacco companies sought to recuse the Judge, who had been assigned to the case. Id. The Judge exercised the discretion vested in him by statute, explaining in detail why he was denying the motion to recuse himself and remanding the action to state court. Id. On appeal, a panel of this court held that the Judge had abused his discretion, reversed his order denying recusal, vacated his order remanding the case to state court, and remanded the American Tobacco Co., Inc., 250 F.3d 315 (5th Cir. 2001) ("Republic of Panama II"), followed, as it had to, the earlier panel decision in a companion case, Republic of Panama v. American Tobacco Co., Inc., 217 F.3d 343 (5th Cir. 2000) ("Republic of Panama I"). Both of these cases involve identical facts and decisions regarding the recusal issue at both the trial and appellate level. We acknowledge that the panel in Republic of Panama II was constrained by precedent and was not free to correct what we view as the error of Republic of Panama I.

action to the district court for reassignment to a different judge. Republic of Panama II, 250 F.3d at 316.

The motion to recuse was based solely on the fact that the Judge had been listed — erroneously — as the president of a specialized bar association (the Louisiana Trial Lawyer's Association ("LTLA")) on that organization's motion seeking permission to file an amicus curiae brief in similar state court tobacco litigation some nine years earlier. The Judge's name did not appear on the amicus brief itself.

Almost a decade prior to his appointment to the federal trial bench, the Judge had served a one-year term as president of the LTLA, from approximately October 1989 — October 1990. In April 1991, some six months after his term as president had expired, LTLA filed the subject motion seeking permission to file an amicus brief in the appeal of a tobacco products liability case in the Supreme Court of Louisiana. Despite his being president no longer, the Judge's name was mistakenly listed as President of the LTLA on the "Motion for Leave to File Amicus Curiae Brief" which was filed simultaneously with the filing of the association's amicus brief. The Judge signed neither the motion nor the brief, either as counsel or as an officer of the putative amicus association. Listed among the counsel on this motion, however, was Michael St. Martin, who is also counsel for the plaintiff in the present action. The amicus brief itself was not signed by Mr. St. Martin (or by the Judge) but by another attorney; neither did the brief or the motion list the Judge as counsel.

Although they were not identical to the allegations in the present case, the LTLA's 1991 amicus brief did contain allegations similar to those in the current litigation, including, inter alia, that smoking is addictive and that it causes cancer, and that the defendant tobacco companies knew or should have known about the health dangers of smoking. The amicus brief argued that the tobacco companies should be held liable because they were negligent in producing their product.

In denying the tobacco defendants' recusal motion in the present case, the Judge specifically informed the parties that, even though his name had been listed on the motion seeking permission to file the amicus brief in state court years ago, it had been placed on the motion by mistake; his term as president of LTLA had ended months before by the time the brief was filed. The Judge further informed the parties that he had nothing to do with the research, writing, signing, or approval of the brief; and that neither as a practicing attorney nor in any other capacity had he ever participated in any tobacco litigation. And the Judge also explained that the decision to file an amicus brief and the determination of the contents of the brief were exclusively governed by the LTLA Amicus Committee, not the president or executive committee of the association.

DISCUSSION

We review the denial of a motion to recuse for abuse of discretion. Trevino v. Johnson, 168 F.3d 173, 178 (5th Cir. 1999). A judge should recuse himself "in any proceeding in which his impartiality might reasonably be questioned." 28 U.S.C. § 455(a). "In order to determine whether a court's impartiality is reasonably in question, the objective inquiry is whether a well-informed, thoughtful and objective observer would question the court's impartiality." Trust Co. v. N.N.P., 104 F.3d 1478, 1491 (5th Cir. 1997). The purpose of § 455(a) is to avoid even an appearance of partiality. United States v. Jordan, 49 F.3d 152, 155 (5th Cir. 1995).

We are firmly convinced that no reasonable person, aware of all the facts, would question any judge's impartiality based on circumstances as attenuated as those presented by this case: (1) The Judge's name was listed, erroneously and without his knowledge, on a motion to file an amicus curiae brief — not even the brief itself; (2) the motion and brief were filed on behalf of an association of which the future judge was a past president; (3) the motion was filed in a state court proceeding seven years before the Judge took the bench and eight years before the present lawsuit was filed; (4) the motion related to a legal issue in which the Judge had never been involved as a practicing attorney or otherwise; and (5) it was filed by lawyers for the association with whom the Judge has never been a partner or an associate.

On appeal, the tobacco companies urged a panel of this court to adopt the rule that any judge who had a "pre-judicial association with the position" — not with the parties, not with the lawyers, but with a "position" — can never fairly decide a case that raises questions pertaining to that "position." In buying into that proposition, the panel clearly called into question the oath we take when we become federal judges. If we should embark on such a perilous course, we will launch a cottage industry in which investigators will comb the contents of speeches made, articles written, and pleadings and briefs filed by a judge prior to his taking of that oath, looking for some trace of evidence suggesting that, prior to his judgeship, the judge held views on legal questions that can be used to disqualify him from hearing cases that implicate such matters. Nothing — not the statute, not our jurisprudence, not the public policy underlying the concept of recusal — supports the panel's decision to require the Judge's recusal under such attenuated circumstances.

Republic of Panama I correctly notes that this record includes no evidence of actual bias on the part of the Judge. Republic of Panama I, 217 F.3d at 347. It nevertheless concludes that nothing more than the mere listing of the Judge's name on a motion to file an amicus brief that years earlier had asserted allegations against tobacco companies similar to those asserted by the plaintiffs in this case, could lead a reasonable person to doubt the Judge's impartiality. Id.

The panel's analysis of Republic of Panama I relies on but a single case, Bradshaw v. McCotter, 785 F.2d 1327 (5th Cir. 1986). In Bradshaw, a criminal defendant argued that a judge on the Texas Court of Criminal Appeals should have been disqualified because at the time of the defendant's conviction the future Judge's name was listed on a brief as State Prosecuting Attorney in the defendant's appeal. Id. at 1328. The judge in Bradshaw explained that in fact he had not participated in the prosecution of the case at all, and that his name had appeared on the brief simply as a matter of courtesy and protocol. We held that whether the judge actually participated in the prosecution was immaterial because the listing of his name on the brief undermined the appearance of impartiality. Id. at 1329.

Yet, when carefully read, the opinion in Bradshaw makes pellucid that it does not present a "somewhat similar fact situation" to that in Republic of Panama I. Republic of Panama I, 217 F.3d at 347. The recusal ordered in Bradshaw was directed at a judge who was not just correctly listed on the State's brief as prosecuting attorney (albeit he did not personally participate in the prosecution), but who was in fact scheduled to hear the appeal of the very same case of the very same criminal defendant. Bradshaw does not deal with a mere amicus; it is not a civil case; it does not involve a union, trade association, or bar association; it correctly identified the judge as the prosecuting attorney; and it implicated a substantive pleading — the appellate brief — not, as here, a non-substantive, procedural motion. Because Bradshaw neither presents nor answers the questions raised by the instant case, it affords no support for the panel's decision to require the Judge's recusal under the present circumstances.

Although Bradshaw offers no map out of the present situation, we are not here navigating uncharted waters. In an earlier en banc decision, this court held that a district judge who, before ever becoming a judge, served as president of a racially segregated bar association, was not thereby disqualified from hearing plaintiffs' claims of racial discrimination in the administration of the Alabama State Bar examination. Parrish v. Bd. of Comm'rs of the Ala. State Bar, 524 F.2d 98 (5th Cir. 1975). Even though that future judge had actually taken steps to change the bar's segregation policy, he was faulted by those who sought his recusal for the failure of his effort to obtain membership for African-American lawyers during his term of leadership. Id. at 101.

Appendix A

We held in Parrish that the allegation concerning the judge's "past activities in the Montgomery [Alabama] Bar Association [] is essentially an allegation based on the judge's background and states no specific facts that would suggest he would be anything but impartial in the deciding the case before him." Id.

The facts in Parrish more closely parallel those presented in this case than do the facts in the Bradshaw decision relied on by the Republic of Panama I panel. Even if the views expressed in the amicus brief ten years earlier had been firmly held by the Judge at the time that the brief was written (note that nothing other than his membership in the amicus association and his prior presidency of it can be cited as evidence that in fact he held those views), this would not be grounds for forced recusal under the jurisprudence of this or any other circuit. More to the point, that is not the question presented by the record in this case, which does not indicate that the Judge ever expressed any anti-tobacco sentiments, either publicly or privately, much less that he ever participated in any tobacco litigation whatsoever, whether as a party or as counsel. His only "taint" was his connection to a bar association that advocated, solely as a friend of the court, a similar position on similar litigation in state court almost a decade earlier. Such an attenuated nexus is woefully insufficient to underpin this court's interference with the Judge's decision, which was well within his discretion.

Equally important in sorting out this issue is the position taken by the United States Supreme Court. In Laird v. Tatum, 409 U.S. 824 (1972) (Rehnquist, J., mem.) then-Associate Justice Rehnquist decided not to disqualify himself on the basis of public statements he had made prior to his appointment to the bench. As a Department of Justice lawyer, he had testified as an expert witness before the Senate Judiciary Committee's Subcommittee on Constitutional Rights regarding the statutory and constitutional law dealing with the authority of the executive branch to gather information. Notably, then-attorney Rehnquist's remarks included a reference to the very case involved (Laird), which then was pending in the D.C. Circuit. Id. at 825-27. The respondents contended that the Justice should disqualify himself because he had previously expressed a public view concerning what the law is or ought to be in the matters presented in the Laird litigation. Id. at 824-25. In declining to recuse, Justice Rehnquist stated:

> Proof that a Justice's mind at the time he joined the court was a complete tabula rasa in the area of constitutional adjudication would be evidence of lack of qualification, not lack of bias. . . .
> The oath prescribed by 28 U.S.C. § 453 which is taken by each person upon becoming a member of the federal judiciary requires that he "administer justice without respect to persons, and do equal right to the poor and to the rich," that he "faithfully and impartially discharge and perform all the duties incumbent upon (him) . . . agreeably to the Constitution and laws of the United States." Every litigant is entitled to have his case heard by a judge mindful of this oath. But neither the oath, the disqualification statute, nor the practice of the former Justices of this Court guarantee a litigant > that each judge will start off from dead center in his willingness or ability to reconcile the opposing arguments of counsel with his understanding of the Constitution and the law. That being the case, it is not a ground for disqualification that a judge has prior to his nomination expressed his then understanding of the meaning of some particular provision of the Constitution.

Id., 409 U.S. at 835; 838-39.

In addition to repudiating clear direction from both our own en banc court and the Supreme Court, the panel opinion disregards the unanimous voices of other U.S. Courts of Appeals that have addressed the issue. For example, in Schurz Communications v. FCC, 982 F.2d 1057 (7th Cir. 1992), Judge Richard Posner denied a recusal motion that was based on an affidavit he had submitted as an expert witness fifteen years earlier in an antitrust case involving the identical question presented in the case in which his disqualification was being sought. Judge Posner reasoned that if 28 U.S.C. § 455(a) were interpreted to require recusal in such a situation,

> I would be eternally disqualified from participating in antitrust or regulatory cases, because when I was a law professor I acted frequently as a consultant and occasionally an as expert witness in regulatory and antitrust matters that presented the same types of issues, often in the same industry, as do cases that come before this court. No decision supports such an interpretation.

> The affidavit repeated views about antitrust policy that I had stated in many different fora over a period of years, and the movants do not and could not argue that a judge should disqualify himself because he has views on a case.

Id. at 1061-62.

Similarly, in a much more closely analogous case, Cipollone v. Liggett, 802 F.2d 658 (3rd Cir. 1986), the district judge had, while in private practice, represented a tobacco company in a case involving a products liability claim like the one currently pending before him as a judge. The Third Circuit affirmed the district court's decision not to recuse himself, stating:

> [P]rior knowledge about legal issues is not a ground for recusal of a Judge. . .. If Judges could be disqualified because their knowledge of legal issues which might be presented in cases coming before them, then only the least-informed and worst-prepared lawyers could be appointed to the bench.

Id. at 659-60. See also United States v. Payne, 944 F.2d 1458 (9th Cir. 1991) (rejecting the notion that generalized policy views, expertise on and exposure to a subject necessitates recusal); United States v. Alabama, 828 F.2d 1532 (11th Cir. 1987) (holding that district judge's background representing plaintiffs in civil rights actions does not warrant disqualification in a school desegregation case brought by United States against Alabama); Rosquist v. Soo Line

Railroad, 692 F.2d 1107 (7th Cir. 1982) (affirming a denial of recusal and holding that a judge is not required to recuse himself merely because he holds and had expressed certain views on a subject.)

In the instant litigation, the defendant tobacco companies imply that the fact that, in the old state case, the name of one of today's opposing counsel was listed as counsel for the amicus association on the same pleading (motion for permission to file an amicus brief) as was the name of the Judge (erroneously) as president of the client association — thereby evidencing that they belonged to the same bar association — requires recusal. This argument is so lacking in merit that it needs no further comment. Another concern raised by the tobacco defendants is that the Judge "appeared" to have been involved in litigation against the same tobacco companies. This too is feckless, as we have long rejected this "identity of parties" argument. For example, in Chitimacha Tribe of Louisiana v. Harry L. Laws Co., Inc., 690 F.2d 1157 (5th Cir. 1982), the presiding judge had, during his law practice prior to assuming the bench some six years earlier, represented Texaco, currently a defendant in the case before him, on an unrelated matter. Id. at 1166. Other defendants in the case were related to partners in the judge's former law firm. Id. at 1167. We agreed with the Judge that his recusal was not required, declaring his connection with Texaco too remote and innocuous to warrant disqualification. If direct representation of a party (not an amicus) six years earlier is too remote, surely mere membership in and past presidency of a bar association whose only nexus with the appeal then pending before the state supreme court was the filing of an amicus brief eight years earlier, relating to a common — but non-represented — party, cannot require reversal of the Judge's exercise of discretion not to recuse himself.

We can perceive no legitimate basis for disturbing the Judge's exercise of discretion in this case and would affirm his denial of the recusal motion. We are satisfied that this issue cuts across ideology, politics, and judicial philosophy, and that it has the potential for undermining the independence of the federal judiciary. No existing jurisprudence supports, much less requires, recusal of a judge who, years before taking the judicial oath, had expressed an opinion on an issue of law, or had represented the same or a related party, or had belonged to and held office in an organization that advocated a particular view of public policy or legal interpretation. Never before has any court accepted "issue recusal" as a ground for reversing a judge who in his own exercise of discretion, concluded that his recusal was not required. The panel decision that this court has refused to rehear en banc sets an alarming precedent by doing precisely that, and trivializes our oath in the process. For these reasons we are constrained to dissent from the refusal of a majority of the judges of this court to vote to rehear this case en banc.

PER CURIAM:

In light of our prior decision in Republic of Panama v. The American Tobacco Co., 217 F.3d 343 (5th Cir. 2000), the district court's order denying recusal is REVERSED. The district court's orders remanding this action to state court and denying Appellants' renewed request and motion for stay are VACATED. We REMAND this action to the district court for reassignment by the Chief Judge of the district court to a different judge for further proceedings.

Reversed in part and vacated in part; remanded for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

Appendix B

ROBERT M. PARKER, Circuit Judge, concurring specially:

While I agree with my colleagues that we are bound by precedent, I write separately because I believe that Republic of Panama was wrongly decided. In that decision, a panel of this court held that the district judge abused his discretion by not recusing himself because the judge's name was listed along with Appellee's counsel on a motion for leave to file an amicus brief in an unrelated action asserting allegations similar to Appellee's.

Such facts do not establish that a reasonable person aware of all the facts would reasonably question the judge's impartiality under 28 U.S.C. § 455(a). See Chitimacha Tribe of Louisiana v. Harry L. Laws Co., 690 F.2d 1157, 1165 (5th Cir. 1982), cert. denied, 464 U.S. 814 (1983). The district judge's name was erroneously listed on the motion for leave to file an amicus brief on behalf of the Louisiana Trial Lawyers' Association ("LTLA"), a voluntary bar organization that routinely expresses legal viewpoints to courts through amicus briefs. The district judge did not participate directly in the researching, writing, or approval of the brief itself, and his name does not appear on the brief. Moreover, the motion and brief were filed more than ten years ago in an unrelated action in Louisiana Supreme Court before the judge's appointment to the federal judiciary. These facts are simply too tenuous to support any reasonable basis for questioning the judge's impartiality, and even if these facts clearly raise the issue of impartiality, it is error to conclude that the judge abused his sound discretion in denying the motion for recusal.

Republic of Panama incorrectly relied on Bradshaw v. McCotter, 785 F.2d 1327 (5th Cir.), rev'd, 796 F.2d 100 (5th Cir. 1986), as presenting a "somewhat similar" factual situation. In Bradshaw, we held that a judge of the Texas Court of Criminal Appeals should have disqualified himself because at the time of the defendant's conviction the judge's name was listed as a prosecuting attorney on a brief opposing the defendant's appeal, even though the listing was simply a matter of courtesy and protocol. Notwithstanding the irrelevance of whether the judge actually participated in the preparation of the brief, Bradshaw is distinguishable from Republic of Panama and this action because in Bradshaw the judge, before taking the bench, was listed as the prosecuting attorney in the same case on appeal before him. In Republic of Panama and this action, the district judge was merely listed as the president of the LTLA on a motion for leave to file an amicus brief in an unrelated action before a different court more than ten years ago.

While Republic of Panama notes that there are no decisions precisely on point, relevant decisions confirm that the district judge's denial of Appellants' motion for recusal was not improper. In Laird v. Tatum, 409 U.S. 824 (1972) (Rehnquist, J., mem.), then-Associate Justice Rehnquist decided not to disqualify himself on the basis of his public statements on the constitutionality of governmental surveillance, which was contrary to the arguments of the parties seeking his disqualification. As a Department of Justice lawyer, Justice Rehnquist had testified as an expert witness before the Senate and publicly stated his views on the constitutionality of governmental surveillance of civilian political activity. He testified that the arguments of the parties seeking disqualification, whose appeal was before the court of appeals during the testimony, lacked merit. Framing the issue as whether disqualification is proper if a judge, "who[,] prior to taking that office[,] has expressed a public view as to what the law is or ought to be should later sit as a judge in a case raising that particular question," id. at 830, Justice Rehnquist analyzed the practices of prior justices, who did not disqualify themselves in cases in which they, prior to taking the bench, previously expressed a viewpoint of the controlling law, and concluded that such public statements could not rationally be the basis for disqualification. Id. at 835-36; see also United States v. Alabama, 828 F.2d 1532, 1542 (11th Cir. 1987) (rejecting, in an action challenging segregation in education, disqualification of a district judge on the basis of his background as a civil rights lawyer representing black plaintiffs and stating "[a] judge is not required to recuse himself merely because he holds and has expressed certain views on a general subject."), cert. denied, 487 U.S. 1210 (1988); Shaw v. Martin, 733 F.2d 304, 316 (4th Cir.) ("One who has voted as a legislator in favor of a statute permitting the death penalty in a proper case cannot thereafter be presumed disqualified to hear capital cases as a judge or predisposed to give a death sentence in any particular case."), cert. denied, 469 U.S. 873 (1984). While Laird was decided prior to the amendment of § 455[1] to include

1. Before the 1974 amendment, § 455 stated:

> Any justice or judge of the United States shall disqualify himself in any case in which he has a substantial interest, has been of counsel, is or has been a material witness, or is so related to or connected with subsection (a),[2] Justice Rehnquist's analysis is important because the motion seeking disqualification based on his prior public statements was not pursuant to any specific provision of § 455 at the time, but on the discretionary portion of the statute, see Tatum, 409 U.S. at 830, which was similar to the "catchall" provision of § 455(a).

Similarly, in Schurz Communications, Inc. v. FCC, 982 F.2d 1057 (7th Cir. 1993) (Posner, J.), Judge Posner denied a motion for disqualification based on an affidavit he submitted as an expert witness on antitrust law prior to becoming a circuit judge. In rejecting the motion, Judge Posner stated "[t]he affidavit repeated views about antitrust policy that I had stated in many different fora over a period of years, and the movants do not and could not argue that a judge should disqualify himself because he has views on a case." Id. at 1062 (citing 13A CHARLES ALAN WRIGHT ET AL., FEDERAL PRACTICE AND PROCEDURE § 3542 at 568-70 (1st ed. 1975)).

Finally, Cipollone v. Liggett Group, Inc., 802 F.2d 658 (3d Cir. 1986), is also important. In Cipollone, the husband > any party or his attorney as to render it improper, in his opinion, for him to sit on the trial, appeal, or other proceeding therein.

28 U.S.C. § 455 (1970), amended by 28 U.S.C. § 455(a)-(f) (2000).

2. The 1974 amendment created § 455(a), which states that "Any justice, judge, or magistrate of the United States shall disqualify himself in any proceeding in which his impartiality might reasonably be questioned."

of a deceased cigarette smoker brought a products liability action against cigarette manufacturers alleging that his wife's injury and death were cigarette-induced. A panel of the Third Circuit held that some of the plaintiff's claims were federally preempted. The plaintiff then moved to vacate the judgment because a member of the panel should have recused himself due to an appearance of partiality. The plaintiff alleged that such appearance of partiality arose because the judge, while in private practice, represented The American Tobacco Company, which was not a defendant in the plaintiff's action, in a similar products liability action The court denied the motion because The American Tobacco Company was not a defendant, the issue of preemption was not raised in the prior litigation involving the judge, and even if The American Tobacco Company were a defendant no reasonable person could question the judge's impartiality because his representation ended more than five years before he took the bench. Id. at 658-59.

In light of these decisions, I am convinced that Republic of Panama is erroneous because it requires recusal on the basis of a judge's public statements on the law made prior to becoming a judge, which I believe is unreasonable under § 455(a). In denouncing such "public statement disqualification," Justice Rehnquist aptly observed that > [i]t would not be merely unusual, but extraordinary, if [judges] had not at least given opinions as to [legal] issues in their previous careers. Proof that a [judge's] mind at the time he joined the [c]ourt was a complete tabular as a . . . would be evidence of lack of qualification, not lack of bias.

Appendix B

Laird, 409 U.S. at 835; cf. Liteky v. United States, 510 U.S. 540, 554 (1994) (Scalia, J.) ("[S]ome opinions [of a judge] acquired outside the context of judicial proceedings (for example, the judge's view of the law acquired in scholarly reading) will not suffice [for recusal]") (emphasis omitted); Cipollone, 802 F.2d at 660 ("If Judges could be disqualified because their background in the practice of law gave them knowledge of the legal issues which might be presented in cases coming before them, then only the least-informed and worst-prepared lawyers could ever be appointed to the bench."). Before taking the bench, we judges solemnly swear or affirm to "faithfully and impartially discharge and perform all the duties," 28 U.S.C. § 653, regardless of our background. To conclude that the district judge abused his discretion in this action would penalize judges for their background and undermine the oath. Thus, I believe we should reconsider Republic of Panama en banc.

Appeal from the United States District Court
for the Eastern District of Louisiana

July 17, 2000

Before EMILIO M. GARZA, DEMOSS, and STEWART, Circuit Judges.

CARL E. STEWART, Circuit Judge:

The defendants appeal the district court's denial of their motion to recuse, the denial of their motion for a stay of proceedings, and the grant of the plaintiff's motion to remand the present action to state court. For the following reasons we reverse.

FACTUAL AND PROCEDURAL BACKGROUND

In October 1998, The Republic of Panama ("Panama") filed the present underlying action in Louisiana state court. Panama alleges that the defendant tobacco companies conspired to conceal the addictiveness and health risks of tobacco. Panama seeks damages for past and future health costs for diseases caused by smoking. The defendant tobacco companies subsequently removed the case to federal court. In December 1998, Panama filed a motion to remand the case to state court. In January 1999, before responding to the motion for remand, the defendants moved to recuse the district court judge assigned to the case, Judge Carl Barbier ("Judge Barbier" or "district court").

Prior to his appointment to the district court, Judge Barbier was president of the Louisiana Trial Lawyer's Association ("LTLA") from approximately October 1989-October 1990. In April 1991, LTLA submitted an amicus brief on behalf of the plaintiffs in a product liability suit against tobacco companies. The LTLA amicus brief alleged that smoking was addictive and caused cancer. The LTLA amicus brief also stated that the tobacco companies have known the dangers of smoking for decades. Judge Barbier's name was listed on the brief as president of LTLA. In February 1999, Judge Barbier denied the motion to recuse, stating that he had not participated in the actual writing of the brief and that his term as president had ended when the brief was filed.

Appendix C

The defendants filed a motion with the Panel on Multidistrict Litigation ("MDL Panel") to have the current case consolidated for pretrial proceedings in the District Columbia. At the time the motion was filed there were six other suits ongoing in the federal court between foreign countries and these defendant tobacco companies. The defendants sought a stay of proceedings in the district court pending the MDL Panel's ruling on whether to transfer the case. Appellants claim that Panama consented to this motion. The district court denied the motion for a stay. The defendants argued their motion for transfer before the MDL panel on May 21, 1999. On May 28, 1999 the district court ordered that the case be remanded to state court. On June 10, 1999 the MDL Panel granted the defendants' motion for transfer of the proceedings.

Appendix C

Discussion

I. Recusal

Appellants argue that the district court abused its discretion in failing to grant its motion for recusal. The appellants contend that despite 28 U.S.C. § 1447(d) which states that remand orders are not reviewable on appeal, a remand order may be vacated if it is rendered following a district court's erroneous ruling on recusal. Appellees contend that a recusal order is not reviewable on appeal, because recusal decisions are subject to review only by an application for writ of mandamus.

A. Procedural Issues

First, we address the appellee's contention that a recusal decision may not be reviewed on appeal, but instead must be presented for review immediately by writ of mandamus. This court addressed a similar question in Tramonte v. Chrysler Corporation, 136 F.3d 1025, 1027-29 (5th Cir. 1998). In Tramonte, the plaintiff filed a class action lawsuit against Chrysler Corporation. The defendant, Chrysler, moved for recusal because the district court judge had family members who owned Chrysler vehicles and who were therefore potential class members. Id. at 1027. The district court judge declined to recuse stating that none of her family members were interested in becoming part of the class. Id. Following this ruling on recusal, the district court remanded the suit to state court. The defendant attacked the recusal decision by petitioning for a writ of mandamus, and the petition was denied. The defendant then appealed the order refusing to recuse, and the remand to state court. In Tramonte, the court reviewed the district court judge's refusal to recuse even though the petition for writ of mandamus had been denied. This court concluded that "mandamus is only appropriate in extraordinary circumstances, typically where relief is unavailable on appeal . . . accordingly . . . [a party] is free to relitigate the recusal issue on appeal." Id. at 1028. Based on this reasoning we conclude that a party may appeal a recusal issue even when the party never applied for a writ of mandamus. The appellees cite various Seventh Circuit cases for the proposition that refusals to recuse may only be reviewed by applying for a writ of mandamus, however, this court has never adopted that viewpoint and this court's decision in Tramonte clearly supports a party's ability to litigate a recusal issue for the first time on appeal.

Next, 28 U.S.C. § 1447(d) generally insulates the district court's remand order from appellate review. However, this court held in Tramonte that if the district court judge should have recused himself any orders entered following disposition of the recusal motion should be vacated. Id. We found that when the district court judge should have been recused, vacating the remand order is a "ministerial task" unrelated to the remand order itself, and thus not prohibited by § 1447(d). Id. Appellees also concede that if this court finds that the recusal order itself is reviewable, and we decide on the merits that the district court judge should have been recused the remand order should be vacated on this basis. Thus, if we find that the district court judge should have been recused the remand order should be vacated. Id. at 1028.

We now address the merits of the district court's denial of the motion to recuse. Denial of recusal is reviewed for abuse of discretion. Trevino v. Johnson, 168 F.3d 173, 178 (5th Cir. 1999). Appellants argue that Judge Barbier should have recused himself pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 455(a) ("§ 455(a)"). Section 455(a) states that a judge should recuse himself "in any proceeding in which his impartiality might reasonably be questioned." "In order to determine whether a court's impartiality is reasonably in question, the objective inquiry is whether a well-informed, thoughtful and objective observer would question the court's impartiality." Trust Co. v. N.N.P., 104 F.3d 1478, 1491 (5th Cir. 1997) (citing United States v. Jordan, 49 F.3d 152, 155-58 (5th Cir. 1995)). The review of a recusal order under § 455(a) is "extremely fact intensive and fact bound," thus a close recitation of the factual basis for the appellants recusal motion is necessary. As this court has previously pointed out, the purpose of § 455(a), and the principle of recusal itself is not just to prevent actual partiality, but to "avoid even the appearance of partiality." Jordan, 49 F.3d at 155. The analysis of a § 455(a) claim must be guided, not by comparison to similar situations addressed by prior jurisprudence, but rather by an independent examination of the facts and circumstances of the particular claim. United States v. Bremers, 195 F.3d 221, 225 (5th Cir. 1999) (citing Jordan, 49 F.3d at 157).

As stated above, before he was appointed to the district court Judge Barbier was president of the LTLA from approximately October 1989-1990. In April 1991, LTLA filed an amicus brief in a product liability case against tobacco companies in Louisiana state court. Judge Barbier's name is listed on the "Motion for Leave to File Amicus Curiae Brief", which was filed with the amicus brief. Judge Barbier is listed on this filing as President of the LTLA. Also listed as counsel for this motion is Michael St. Martin, who is counsel for Panama in the present action. The amicus brief itself which was attached to the motion was signed by another attorney and does not list Judge Barbier as counsel. While arguably the facts of the Louisiana product liability suit and the present suit may be distinguishable, the amicus brief contained general statements about tobacco companies. These statements included that tobacco use is addictive. The amicus brief also stated that the defendant tobacco companies should be held liable because they were negligent in producing a product that was more dangerous than it was intended to be, and that the companies knew or should have known of the addictive nature of their cigarettes. In the present case, Panama similarly asserts that as a result of defective and dangerous design, testing, manufacturing, marketing and practices, the product produced by the defendants is defective and unreasonably dangerous.

Judge Barbier informed the parties that while his name is listed on the motion to file the amicus brief, it was placed on the motion by mistake. Judge Barbier also stated that his term as president of LTLA had ended by the time the brief was filed, and that he had nothing to do with the researching, writing, signing, or approval of the brief. Judge Barbier explained that in the LTLA the decision to file an amicus brief and the contents of those briefs is exclusively governed by the LTLA Amicus Committee.

While a review of our case law has not revealed a case which is precisely on point, a somewhat similar factual situation was at issue in Bradshaw v. McCotter, 785 F.2d 1327 (5th Cir. 1986), rev'd, 796 F.2d 100 (5th Cir. 1986). In Bradshaw, the defendant argued that a judge on Texas Court of Criminal Appeals should have been disqualified because at the time of the defendant's conviction his name was listed on a brief as State Prosecuting Attorney in the defendant's appeal. Id. at 1328. The judge explained that he had not actually participated in the prosecution of the case at all, but his name had appeared on the brief simply as a matter of courtesy and protocol. We found that "whether [the judge] actually participated in [the] prosecution must be found to be immaterial." Id. at 1329. We further held that the appearance of the judge's name on the brief undermined the appearance of the judge's neutrality. Id.

In the present case, while there is no evidence of actual bias we must consider whether a reasonable person might harbor doubts about the trial judge's impartiality. The fact that Judge Barbier's name was listed on a motion to file an amicus brief which asserted similar allegations against tobacco companies to the ones made in this case may lead a reasonable person to doubt his impartiality. Also, Judge Barbier was listed on this filing with the attorney who is currently representing the Republic of Panama. The trial judge's assertions that he did not participate directly in the writing or researching of the amicus brief do not dissipate the doubts that a reasonable person would probably have about the court's impartiality. We acknowledge that this is a close case for recusal. However, we have previously held that if the question of whether § 455(a) requires disqualification is a close one the balance tips in favor of recusal. In Re: Chevron, 121 F.3d 163, 165 (5th Cir. 1997).

Accordingly, we hold that a reasonable person might harbor doubts about the trial judge's impartiality, and thus the district court abused its discretion in denying the defendants' motion to recuse.

Having found that the district court should have granted the defendant's motion to recuse we now address the district court's subsequent decisions to remand the case to state court, and its decision to stay the proceedings to await a decision on the defendant's motion before the MDL Panel to transfer the case. Because the district court should have recused itself the remand order and denial of the motion to stay proceedings, both entered following the disposition of the recusal motion should be vacated. Consequently we do not address the merits of the remand motion or the denial of the motion for stay. See Tramonte, 136 F.3d at 1028. ("if [the district court judge] should have recused [himself], any orders [he] entered following disposition of the recusal motion should be vacated.").

CONCLUSION

For the above reasons, we VACATE the order remanding this case to state court and REMAND this case to the Eastern District of Louisiana. We further direct the Chief Judge of the Eastern District of Louisiana to reassign this case for further proceedings before a different district judge in that district.

SECTION: "J"(5)

THE STATE OF SAO PAULO OF THE FEDERATIVE REPUBLIC OF BRAZIL

VERSUS

THE AMERICAN TOBACCO COMPANY, INC., ET AL

Before the Court are two opposed motions: defendants' Motion to Recuse (00-922 Rec. Doc. 7); and plaintiff's Motion to Remand (98-3279 Rec. Doc. 72). The motions, set for hearing on May 24, 2000, are before the Court on briefs without oral argument. Additionally, while not re-urged as a new motion to stay this case pending the decision of the MDL Panel, defendants have also filed a "Notice of Proceedings Before the MDL Panel" (98-2379 Rec. Doc. 89), suggesting that this Court should refrain from ruling on the Motion to Remand pending a decision on transfer by the MDL Panel, which the Court addresses briefly below.

I. Renewed Request for Stay

Defendants urge this Court to stay this matter pending a decision by the MDL panel on whether this matter should be transferred as a "tag-along" with other cases being consolidated before Judge Friedman in the District of District of Columbia, based chiefly on the argument that failure to do so will result in inconsistent rulings. However, this reasoning has been mooted by the passage of time. To date, two other motions to remand have been granted by transferor courts (one being Republic of Panama, 98-3279). Thus, if the transferee court were to deny all of the other motions to remand based on similar arguments, it would already be too late to avoid inconsistent rulings. If, on the other hand, the transferee court grants the motions to remand, there will be no problem of inconsistent results.

JPML Panel Rule 1.5 states:

> The pendency of a motion, order to show cause, conditional transfer order or conditional remand order before the Panel concerning transfer or remand of an action pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 1407 does not affect or suspend orders and pretrial proceedings in the district court in which the action is pending and does not in any way limit the pretrial jurisdiction of that court.

181 F.R.D. 1, 3 (1988) (emphasis added).

While defendants in their papers filed with the Court seem to grudgingly acknowledge that the foregoing is the law, at the same time they seem to suggest that notwithstanding this, a stay pending a decision by the MDL Panel is somehow favored. This suggestion is conclusively undermined by the transcript of proceedings before the MDL Panel held on May 21, 1999, and included as Exhibit H to defendants' "Notice of Proceedings". During that hearing, Chairman Judge Nangle, in discussing the status of a pending motion to remand in another transferor district, stated: "[The transferor district judge] has every right to reach a decision on that motion, write it out today, yesterday, maybe has done so. You understand that." Exh. K, 99:17-19. The Chairman continues: "There is not one thing this Panel ever does, other than to tell these [transferor] judges, decide whatever motions you want, you have authority, etcetera, etcetera." Exh. K, 99:21-25. In fact, the Chairman goes on to lament the fact that transferor judges often choose (either formally or informally) not to exercise their continued jurisdiction, and that attorneys are unaware that the transferor's jurisdiction continues:

> [L]awyers who practice in front of this Panel, even those who are here quite frequently don't seem to understand that the transferror [sic] judges, for whatever reason and for good reasons, for crying out loud, don't act on these motions to remand very often while — they almost always stay their actions until the Panel acts. That is contrary. They don't have to do it that way but that is the way they do it. So as a result, we end up centralizing cases in many instances where > there are pending motions to remand because the particular transferror [sic] court has not decided to take any action.

Exh. K, 106:16-25.

Chairman Judge Nangle's statements, if anything, reflect a preference that transferor courts consider, not stay, pending motions to remand, to avoid the judicial inefficiency and delay incurred when cases which will ultimately be remanded to state court are centralized for a period before the transferee judge. Such reasoning is consistent with the jurisprudence which requires district courts to consider jurisdiction as a threshold issue. See Copling v. The Container Store, Inc., 174 F.3d 590, 595 (5th Cir. 1999). Accordingly, the Court will not refrain from ruling on the motions now before it.

II. Motion to Recuse

In their motion to recuse the district court judge, defendants incorporate by reference the motions and memoranda submitted in connection with their Motion to Recuse filed in the consolidated case, Civil Action 98-3279, Republic of Panama v. American Tobacco, et al., which the Court denied for reasons stated in open court following oral argument on the motion held on February 3, 1999. The Court likewise adopts the reasons given for the denial of the Motion to Recuse filed in Republic of Panama, and accordingly, finds that the Motion to Recuse filed herein should be denied.

III. Motion to Remand

Defendants removed this case to federal court based upon two grounds: first, they argue that plaintiff's complaint states claims which fall within the federal common law of foreign relations, and therefore presents a federal question (28 U.S.C. § 1331); and second, they argue that diversity jurisdiction is present because this case presents an action between a foreign state as plaintiff and citizens of different states, and the amount in controversy exceeds $75,000 (28 U.S.C. § 1332(a)(4)).

Plaintiff has filed a motion to remand arguing that removal to this Court is improper because (1) its complaint presents no federal question that would confer jurisdiction on this Court; and (2) that the presence of a U.K.-based defendant, B.A.T. Industries, precludes diversity jurisdiction pursuant to 28 U.S.C. 1332(a)(4).

A. 28 U.S.C. § 1331 — Federal Question Jurisdiction

In their notice of removal, defendants allege that because this action implicates the vital economic and sovereign interests of a foreign government, it falls within the federal common law of foreign relations, and therefore presents a federal question. In its ruling granting the motion to remand filed in Republic of Panama, the Court discussed at length the reasons why that case did not fall within the federal common law of foreign relations. There are no facts in the case now before the Court that distinguish this case from Panama with respect to that issue, and the Court therefore adopts the reasoning in its prior opinion, which it declines to re-state here.[1] Thus, the Court finds that the federal law of foreign relations does not provide a basis for jurisdiction over this action pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 1331.

B. 28 U.S.C. § 1332 – Diversity Jurisdiction

The arguments presented in support of a finding of diversity jurisdiction are twofold. First, defendants argue that 28 U.S.C. § 1332(a)(4) provides original jurisdiction because plaintiff's complaint is brought by a foreign state against citizens of domestic states. In this regard, defendants further argue that the foreign citizenship of U.K.-based defendant B.A.T. Industries does not preclude application of this provision. Second (and alternatively) defendants assert that the citizenship of B.A.T. Industries should be overlooked because it has been fraudulently joined.

Title 28, section 1332(a) provides in pertinent part:

> The district courts shall have original jurisdiction of all civil actions where the matter in controversy exceeds the sum or value of $75,000, exclusive of interests and costs, and is between —
>
> (4) a foreign state, defined in section 1603(a) of this title, as plaintiff and citizens of a State or of different States.

1. For the full opinion, see 1999 WL 350030 (E.D. La.).

Despite the fact that the plain language of this statute does not confer original jurisdiction in cases where a foreign state has sued a citizen of another 1603(a) foreign state (as occurred in the instant case), defendants argue that the legislative history of the provision mandates a finding that it applies under that scenario as well, and thus confers original jurisdiction over plaintiff's claims against B.A.T. Industries.

However, it is well-settled that section 1332 requires complete diversity. Strawbridge v. Curtiss, 3 Cranch 267, 2 L.Ed. 435 (1806). The United States Supreme Court has recognized that the presence of two foreign entities on opposing sides of an action renders diversity incomplete. Ruhrgas AG v. Marathon Oil Co., 526 U.S. 574, 580, 119 S. Ct. 1563, 1568 n.2 (1999). Therefore, the Court finds the presence of defendant B.A.T. Industries, a U.K. citizen, defeats the diversity alleged by defendants.

As for the contention by defendants that B.A.T. was fraudulently joined, this mere allegation without facts to substantiate it cannot provide a basis for a finding of fraudulent joinder, and defendants have provided no such facts in either their Notice of Removal or opposition memorandum to the Motion to Remand.[2] Thus, no basis for federal jurisdiction exists under either 28 U.S.C. § 1331 or § 1332. Accordingly;

2. While defendants have urged several compelling arguments in support of their contention that the Louisiana-based distributors were fraudulently joined, those arguments have no application to B.A.T. Industries, which is alleged to be a manufacturer. Accordingly, it is not necessary for the Court to reach the issue of whether the Louisiana distributors were fraudulently joined.

Appendix D

IT IS ORDERED that defendants' Motion to Recuse should be and is hereby DENIED;

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that, pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 1447(c), plaintiff's Motion to Remand should be and is hereby GRANTED, and this matter is hereby REMANDED to the Civil District Court for the Parish of Orleans.

TRANSCRIPT OF PROCEEDINGS
HEARD BEFORE THE HONORABLE CARL J. BARBIER
UNITED STATES DISTRICT JUDGE PRESIDING

[21] * * *

THE COURT: Well, that's not what I read. I hadn't read the Gilboy brief until — the first time I actually read the Gilboy brief was when this issue came up, to my knowledge. I absolutely believe I had never read that brief before. Or ever saw it before.

* * *

THE COURT: So that is in the record, will form part of the record here. But the facts in essence are as follows: That at the time the Gilboy brief was filed in 19, apparently [38] in April, at the end, 30 of 1991, first of all, I was not the president of Louisiana Trial Lawyers Association. I was past president of Louisiana Trial Lawyers Association, having left that office in September, October of the previous year.

Secondly, I had absolutely nothing to do with researching, writing, signing or approving this brief in any manner; although obviously my name appears on it through some mistake. I can't account for how or why it's on there, other than someone must have mistakenly believed I was president of the LTLA and listed my name on there for that reason.

Interestingly my name appears apparently on the motion for leave to file the amicus brief, not on the brief itself. The brief is signed and apparently prepared by Mr. Adolph J. Levy. And the motion for leave was signed apparently by Mr. Lawrence Kullman who at that time was chairman, appeared as chairman of the Amicus Committee of Louisiana Trial Lawyers Association.

The other names that appear on the Motion for Leave are all members of the Amicus Committee of Louisiana Trial Lawyers Association with one exception, and that being Ms. Leah Guerry who was then executive director of the Louisiana Trial Lawyers Association.

Appendix E

The procedure at that time was that the Amicus Committee and the members of the Amicus Committee alone decided whether and when to file amicus briefs. It was not something [39] that was passed by the Board of Governors or Executive Committee or whatever. That's how it was done. To my knowledge that's probably how it's still done, I'm not sure.

But in any event, that's how it was done then. And I know that as I said, and I'll say this again for the record, I had nothing to do with that. I didn't research or write this brief or sign it, I didn't approve it in any way or concur in its being filed in any way. I never had the occasion to do that. It wasn't something that had to be approved by anyone other than the eight or nine members of the Amicus Committee, however number there are.

As a matter of fact, I'll say this for the record, too. I don't believe there's any basis for recusal under 455(b)(1) which says that a judge shall disqualify himself where he has personal knowledge of the disputed evidentiary facts concerning the proceedings. I have absolutely no personal knowledge of any of the disputed or alleged facts in the Gilboy case. None. Period. All I know about is what I have read in the Gilboy brief and in the reported decision now and in what you all have set forth in your memoranda.

I have never represented any party in any tobacco related litigation, I have never been associated with, other than by virtue of being members of the same organization, I have never been associated in legal practice or in any case with any of the other lawyers listed there or the lawyers in [40] this case; and it seems to be, the allegation seems to be somehow that because my name appears near or next to Mr. Mike St. Martin's name that that somehow is the grounds for recusal.

I know Mr. St. Martin obviously. I've never been associated with Mr. St. Martin in 28 years of practicing law in a single case, not one. Except for the mistaken or inadvertent listing of my name on this motion for leave to file the amicus brief, I have never taken or expressed any position or opinion regarding the tobacco industry or any of the issues raised in this litigation.

THE COURT: Does anyone else want to chime in on this one?

Let me just state some facts as I appreciate, as I recall them, for the record.

First of all, I personally had nothing to do with writing this brief, nothing whatsoever. My name is listed on the motion and, I guess — is it on the brief, too? It looks like just on the motion.

MS. ROUEN: I think that's correct.

THE COURT: Apparently this brief was done by Mr. A. J. Levy on behalf of the Louisiana Trial Lawyers Association.

[8] I can't explain actually how or why my name is listed on there as president of the Louisiana Trial Lawyers Association. I believe the practice, as I recall, was, as a matter of form, to just list whoever happened to be president at that time with the Amicus committee on the briefing on the motion.

However, since I just noted — and I didn't realize the date here until I just read this a few minutes ago and looked at the date this was filed, which looks like it was April 30th or May 1st, 1991 — I was no longer president of LTLA, so, whoever prepared this, who I suppose was either Mr. Kullman, who signed the motion as chairman of the Amicus Committee, or Mr. Levy, who apparently prepared the brief, they mistakenly or inadvertently listed me as president of LTLA. I was president of that organization from sometime in the fall — I can't give you the exact dates, but it was either September or October because that's when the term always ends — of 1989 until the fall of 1990.

So, when this was filed, I was no longer president of LTLA. I know I had no personal involvement in the writing of this brief. I think I was vaguely aware of this case. I think I remember reading the Supreme Court decision when it came out later. I can't even tell you, as we sit here, honestly what the holding was in that case, what the real issue was.

[9] I didn't represent any party in that case. I have never represented any parties for or against any tobacco company. I have never been involved in a tobacco case one way or another in my whole legal career.

So, with those facts on the record, I just don't see where objectively my impartiality could be questioned.

There's another issue here that I thought about, and that is, I'm not sure that even if I had prepared the brief and signed the brief that that would be grounds for recusal, because if you think about it, I suppose then that would open the door to Pandora's box, because after practicing law for 28 or 29 years, I have taken many different positions on different legal issues that, I guess, any party in any case could find a brief or a lawsuit or a memoranda that I filed somewhere along the way, and if they thought it conflicted with a position involving their client in a case now, that would open every judge in this court to recusal on a Pandora's box of issues, it seems to me, if that was the standard, that at sometime in the past, as a lawyer, you had signed a pleading taking a position on a issue that may or may not be involved somehow in a totally unrelated case ten years later.

That's just how I'm looking at it, Debbie, if you want to respond.

APPENDIX G — MOTION OF THE LOUISIANA TRIAL LAWYERS ASSOCIATION FOR LEAVE OF COURT TO FILE AMICUS CURIAE BRIEF IN GILBOY v. THE AMERICAN TOBACCO COMPANY, et al. DATED APRIL 30, 1991

SUPREME COURT OF LOUISIANA

DOCKET NUMBER 90 C 2686

ROBERT C. GILBOY

VERSUS

THE AMERICAN TOBACCO COMPANY, ET AL.

MOTION OF THE LOUISIANA TRIAL LAWYERS ASSOCIATION FOR LEAVE OF COURT TO FILE AMICUS CURIAE BRIEF

NOW INTO COURT comes Lawrence S. Kullman, Chairman of the Amicus Curiae Committee of the Louisiana Trial Lawyers Association, who respectfully requests leave of court on behalf of the Louisiana Trial Lawyers Association to file an amicus curiae brief in the above captioned matter. The legal issue presented is one which significantly impacts the rights of victims of product caused injuries and is an important matter of Louisiana law. As such, the undersigned respectfully requests that this Court grant the Louisiana Trial Lawyers Association leave to file an amicus curiae brief.
